Bello's v. Cal Poly

Case continues despite ruling

SUMMER MUSTANG STAFF WRITER

The continuing fight over the Cal Poly trademark may be moving to a new battlefield — the Supreme Court.

The owner of the downtown sporting goods store Bello's has decided to take his case to the high court after the Court of Appeal's latest unanimous ruling on June 18 to protect the Cal Poly trademark from commercial use without the university's permission.

Tom Bello, owner of Bello's, said his store has the right to use the name commercially because he was selling Cal Poly merchandise to the public even before the campus was.

The initial Superior Court ruling in the case was a loss for the California State University system, stating that the Cal Poly name was generic. CSU officials then asked the state legislature to add an amendment to the Education Code protecting university nicknames as well as official names. In a blow to Bello's, the amendment was signed by the Gov. Grey Davis in 2001.

IT department loses funds

► Department unrest leads donors to put hold on scholarships, says alumna

By Genevieve Fussell

SUMMER MUSTANG STAFF WRITER

The unrest plaguing the Cal Poly Industrial Technology Department has reached new heights with the withdrawal of scholarship funding, an outright protest to the Orfalea College of Business' refusal to relinquish the department.

The indefinite removal of the Stephen O. Anderson Scholarship, fully endowed for the past 20 years and awarded every other year, is the latest in a trail of setbacks for the OCOB. The scholarship was created by Dianne Yoder, a Cal Poly alumna as well as mother and wife of alumni, in honor of her husband and the father of their children. A steadfast supporter of the program and member of the IT Advisory Board since its inception, Yoder is deeply involved in and concerned with the department's fate.

"I can't understand that when everyone's in an uproar about the situation, how the administration can stick their heads in the sand and ignore it?" she said.

The nonchalance with which the administration has handled the situation ultimately drove Yoder to place a hold on the funds, unable to trust the OCOB with her scholarship any longer, she said.

The situation has "gone off the rails because of the attitude and approach of the current management in the (OCOB)," Yoder said.

However, Yoder is dedicated to getting the department back on track by encouraging constructive discussion among key parties involved, she said. She stresses the importance of trumpeting the interests of students, especially at Cal Poly, where a learn-by-doing philosophy concentrates on the performance of its students.

Yoder praises industrial technology as a "dynamic and vital program." Its ability to bridge the gap between technology and business effectively is both unique and rare, Yoder said, given today's job market, where Cal Poly graduates represent some of the best in the nation.

The problem is by no means new. The pulling of funds is just the latest in a chain of events that is stirring debate and worry among faculty and students. In the past 36 years teaching at Cal Poly, industrial technology professor Leslie Labhard never recalls the actual withdrawal of funds, an unprecedented situation she finds "very depressing."

Labhard, who has been with the IT department for 12 years, blames "micro-management" at the dean's office for the underlying problems, ranging from budget concerns to a

Bill may give public access to names of sex offenders

By Hillary Schuler-Jones

Cal Poly students and faculty will have access to the names of registered sex offenders who live and work on campus if a new Megan's Law bill is approved by the California State Senate.

Current state law requires sex offenders to register with local law enforcement agencies each time they relocate. Since October 2002, offenders who live or work on college campuses must also register with the police agency that has jurisdiction over the campus. But campus police have not had the ability to release those names.

Adam Mednick's first political science course at Cal Poly sparked his interest in the California State University's budget crisis. As a result, the physics and electrical engineering major organized a bus trip to the CSU

Board of Trustees meeting in Long Beach for the decision.

The California Faculty Association is paying for the bus trip, as well as a free lunch at the meeting, Mednick said.

Mid-State Fair begins at end of month

By Luke Darling

SUMMER MUSTANG STAFF WRITER

As the weather warms up on the Central Coast and the long days of summer drift slowly by, the annual California Mid-State Fair (CMSF) rolls back into Paso Robles for its 57th year.

With fried Snickers and Twinkies, agricultural showcases, monster trucks and tractor pulls and a long list of entertainers the CMSF will be running for 12 straight days from July 23 to Aug. 3.

"It's a big bait to draw people in for the entire Central Coast as a whole and not just the Paso Robles area," publicity director Dana Stroud said. "Once people come with their families and experience what the fair has to offer, then they'll be more apt to return and enjoy the other qualities of the area, Hearst Castle, the beaches and the entire central coast atmosphere."

Since its first year in 1946, after WWII, CMSF has been growing every year. Last year's attendance over the 12 day event reached 375,000.

Stroud emphasized the importance of the length of time the fair is offered as one of the major factors for success each year.

"The length of time is a good fit," Stroud said. "It encompasses two weekends and gives people multiple opportunities to attend and with the 12 days it gives us a larger window of opportunity to try and fit entertainers and musicians with busy summer schedules into the CMSF lineup."

This year CMSF officials expect attendance to climb even higher as they will be providing eight nights of musical performances. Toby audience that the CFA would like students to fill," Mednick said.

He said this meeting is an open forum and students are encouraged to voice their opinion.

Faculty members and students from the CSU system will attend, in addition to the CSU Board of Trustee members, said Clara Potes-Fellow, CSU manager of media information.

The CFA is an umbrella organization for faculty of the California State University System. According to their website, 24,000 professors, lecturers, counselors, and coaches who work for the CSU belong to this organization.

The proposed budget cuts threaten over 1,000 jobs within the CSU system, and may raise student fees by 30 percent, according to the June 26 Mustang Daily article. In response to the cuts, the CFA has created a set of principles that seek to protect instruction, focus on management expenditures, reduce non-essential operating expenditures, and avoid campus based fee increases, according to their website.

The fee increase will be proposed at the meeting. Attendees will discuss the proposal and board members will then vote, Potes-Fellow said.

Mednick encourages students of all CSU campuses to attend the meeting.

"Just having all of those seats filled would be awesome," he said.

For more information on the bus trip to Long Beach, contact Adam Mednick at amednick@calpoly.edu by 2 p.m. on July 10. Students will assemble on campus early in the morning on July 16 and spend most of the day on the trip.

Health Beat

The inside scoop on health happenings at Poly

It's just you and the mirror. You're in conflict again, cursing the inch of stomach fat only you can see, silently hating your thighs, wishing you looked like someone else. The only solution, you think, is to not eat or to get rid of what you do consume.

Eating disorders are a problem women and men. In the United States, five to 10 million females and one million males struggle with eating disorders, including anorexia, bulimia, binge eating disorder or other borderline conditions, according to the National Eating Disorders Association.

News Column

The problem is especially serious on college campuses. Five to 20 percent of college females have eating disorders and 1 to 7 percent of male students also suffer from the disorders, according to George Mason University Counseling Center.

College creates an environment of high academic and social stress with added pressure to conform to appearance standards set by the media and peers. Though purging or dietary restrictions may seem like an easy way to lose 10 pounds, the long-term effects of these activities can lead to a slow suicide. Internal organs, bones, muscles and reproductive organs are all compromised as the body starves.

"These diseases are more prevalent in areas where high achievement and perfectionism are expected," said Charlene Korsgaard, a psychologist in the Counseling Center. "You see it more in the Greek system and in athletics, including dance."

Cal Poly is no exception. Maya Andlig, women's and SAFER programs coordinator, said the folklore on campus is an indicator of the body image and eating disorder problems at the university.

"There are stories circulating campus that, because there's so much bingeing and purging, there are plumbing problems in the dorms," she said.

On-campus resources are limited, but there is help available.

Peer Health Education offers information pamphlets and the Counseling Center offers short-term care and connects students with off-campus resources. This summer, students can also attend a new eating disorders support group created by two second-year graduate students.

Ashley Nelson and Cassidy Kertman created the weekly discussion group to provide students with peer support. They started the program in the summer because students tend to have lighter school and workloads, but hope to continue meeting in fall if interest remains high.

"The group is there to encourage people to get help before it's so serious that it interrupts their college educations," Andlig said.

As eating disorders progress, students tend to become increasingly isolated. Often, they don't join social groups so they're not pressured to eat or they miss class to exercise.

"We're creating an environment where individuals experiencing these disorders can both find support and learn from others as well," Nelson said. "We're helping them see they're not alone."

Friends are another source of support, but their help is only useful if they address the problem in a concerned, kind, nonaccusatory manner, Korsgaard said. Eating disorder sufferers are more likely to be resistant to help if they feel found out or discovered.

"Eating disorders are a secret," she said. "If you've found out their secret, they'll be defensive."

Korsgaard also suggests gathering resources about the disorders, like pamphlets or campus opportunities, before approaching friends.

Eating Disorders Support Group meets Wednesdays at 4:15 p.m. in the Women's Center. Call 756-5839. The Counseling Center offers weekday appointments. Call 756-1211.

BELLOS

Neil Tardiff, Bello's lawyer in the case, said the amendment should not be a factor in the case.

"I don't think it should be applied (to the case), our position is they can't apply (the law) retroactively," Tardiff said. "You also have a serious separation of powers issue, you have the Legislature trying to overrule a trial court. There is a separation of powers for a reason."

Carlos Cardova is legal counsel for Cal Poly and has been working in the Bello's case since the initial lawsuit filing in 1999. He said the case won't likely make it to the Supreme Court due to the fact that such a high number of cases are placed before the Supreme Court each year, yet only a few are actually seen.

Cardova said it is the exploitation of the Cal Poly name the school is concerned about, not the monetary value of the merchandise sold with it.

"The Appellate Court ruled that Bello's has 'no constitutional right to commercially exploit the value of the university's hard won reputation,'" Cardova said. "The deprivation of income from the unlicensed commercial use of our name by Bello's sporting goods was not a significant factor in our decision to seek an injunction in this case. There's a more far-reaching potential effect. If we lose control of our name, it could be used by anyone in any manner, even in inappropriate ways."

Bello said the public is being misled in the way Cal Poly is portraying itself, especially when it comes to the offers of licensing and purchasing of merchandise offers.

"Their licensing offers were a joke, they would be controlling us completely, there were tons of conditions. With all their restrictions, it made it impossible," Bello said.

Tardiff agrees with Bello, adding that the case would welcome a more realistic offer.

"The offer that they made us was so unreasonable, nobody would have accepted it. If they would make us a reasonable offer, we would accept it," Tardiff said.

So far, no new offers have come from Cal Poly, and Bello's is expected to file a petition to appeal to the Supreme Court within the next five weeks.

"I think we have about a 50/50 chance of being seen by the Supreme Court, I think we have a good case behind us," Tardiff said.

National Briefs

NEW YORK — Information panels along a viewing wall at the World Trade Center site, directly below a memorial list of victims' names, have been defaced with graffiti.

"After what happened here ... it's tacky and unpatriotic," said JoAnn Marquis, visiting the site with her husband from Salem, Mass.

The panels outline the twin towers' history, including their construction, the 1993 bombing and their ultimate destruction by terrorists on Sept. 11, 2001.

The diagrams and photos are now covered with writing, often scrawled in black marker.

Some of the messages are words of hope, remembrance or prayer: "God bless you. ... We will never forget."

Others are indecipherable or vaguely crude: "madison arrived here... Jaz — A.K.A Big Butt..."

"I think it's terrible," said Jan Rodriguez of Boston. "I think it's somebody that just has no consideration for the people who lost their lives here."

Many visitors to the site said they considered even positive messages inappropriate.

Studies show little advantage to high-dose chemotherapy for high-risk breast cancer

An aggressive and grueling treatment for breast cancer that uses doses of chemotherapy so high that it destroys the patient's bone marrow offers little or no benefit over standard chemo for women who run the risk of a recurrence, two studies show.

The research could signal the end for the expensive and controversial treatment, though some believe it may eventually prove superior in some women.

Ultrahigh-dose chemotherapy employs many times the normal level of cancer drugs. Because the treatment also kills the bone marrow, the patient has to get a transplant of blood-forming stem cells collected from her own body.

The approach became widely used for advanced breast cancer when preliminary studies suggested it was better than the conventional chemotherapy offered to women after surgery.

But more rigorous studies in the 1990s found that the intensive treatment did not improve the outcome for women whose cancer had spread to other parts of the body. Because of those disappointing results, the approach is seldom used now outside of medical studies.

The research in Thursday's New England Journal of Medicine looked at the treatment in patients whose cancer had spread only to their lymph nodes, putting them at high risk for a relapse.

In both studies, there was little difference between the two approaches in survival after five or six years or in the rate of cancer recurrence.

"I think the evidence of benefit is so minimal ... and the toxicity is so substantial and the cost so high that by and large people are going to say this approach is now no longer worthy of pursuing in any major way," said Dr. Harmon Eyre, chief medical officer of the American Cancer Society.

International Briefs

Study indicates fertility treatment children are healthy

MADRID, Spain — The longest study of children born from in vitro fertilization and similar treatments is reassuring on intelligence scores and psychological health, but raises concerns the rate of birth defects may be higher than normal, researchers said Wednesday.

The study, funded by the European Union, involved more than 1,500 children from Britain, Belgium, Sweden, Denmark and Greece tracked up to age 5.

Other studies have hinted that children conceived by a technique that involves injecting the sperm directly into the egg may have a higher rate of malformations, but experts say neither those, nor the latest study, are robust enough to draw conclusions on birth defects.

However, they said the findings on intelligence and psychological health were convincing.

The researchers, who presented the results Wednesday at the annual meeting of the European Society of Human Reproduction and Embryology, assessed the physical development, family relationships and intellectual, psychological and social development of the children.

The children included 440 conceived by in vitro fertilization, where the sperm and egg are placed in a dish together and fertilization takes place before the resulting embryo is implanted in the womb.

An additional 535 were created by injecting sperm directly into an egg outside the woman's body, a technique known as intracytoplasmic sperm injection, or ICSI.

European Parliament passes rules on use of biotech crops in attempt to avoid spat with U.S.

BRUSSELS, Belgium — Seeking to avoid a trade battle with Washington, the European Parliament on Wednesday paved the way for new biotech foods to be sold in Europe if they are clearly labeled.

European consumers, however, might not buy the genetically modified products — anything from dog food to pizza dough to popcorn — because of widespread public fears of what critics deride as "Frankenfood."

The 626-member EU assembly, meeting in Strasbourg, France, gave final approval to legislation introducing tougher labeling of new genetically altered food products.

That will enable consumers to tell whether products contain biotech ingredients and allow the European Union to do away with its five-year freeze on the introduction of new biotech products.

Kuwaiti women cast their ballots Saturday — but only in mock elections

KUWAIT CITY — Rola Dashti felt a surge of joy when she first held a voter registration card with her name on it. But it faded quickly. The card, after all, wasn't real.

Dashti will cast her ballot Saturday when the country's next parliament is chosen, thanks to a journalists' association that has organized mock elections for women. Only men can vote in Kuwait.

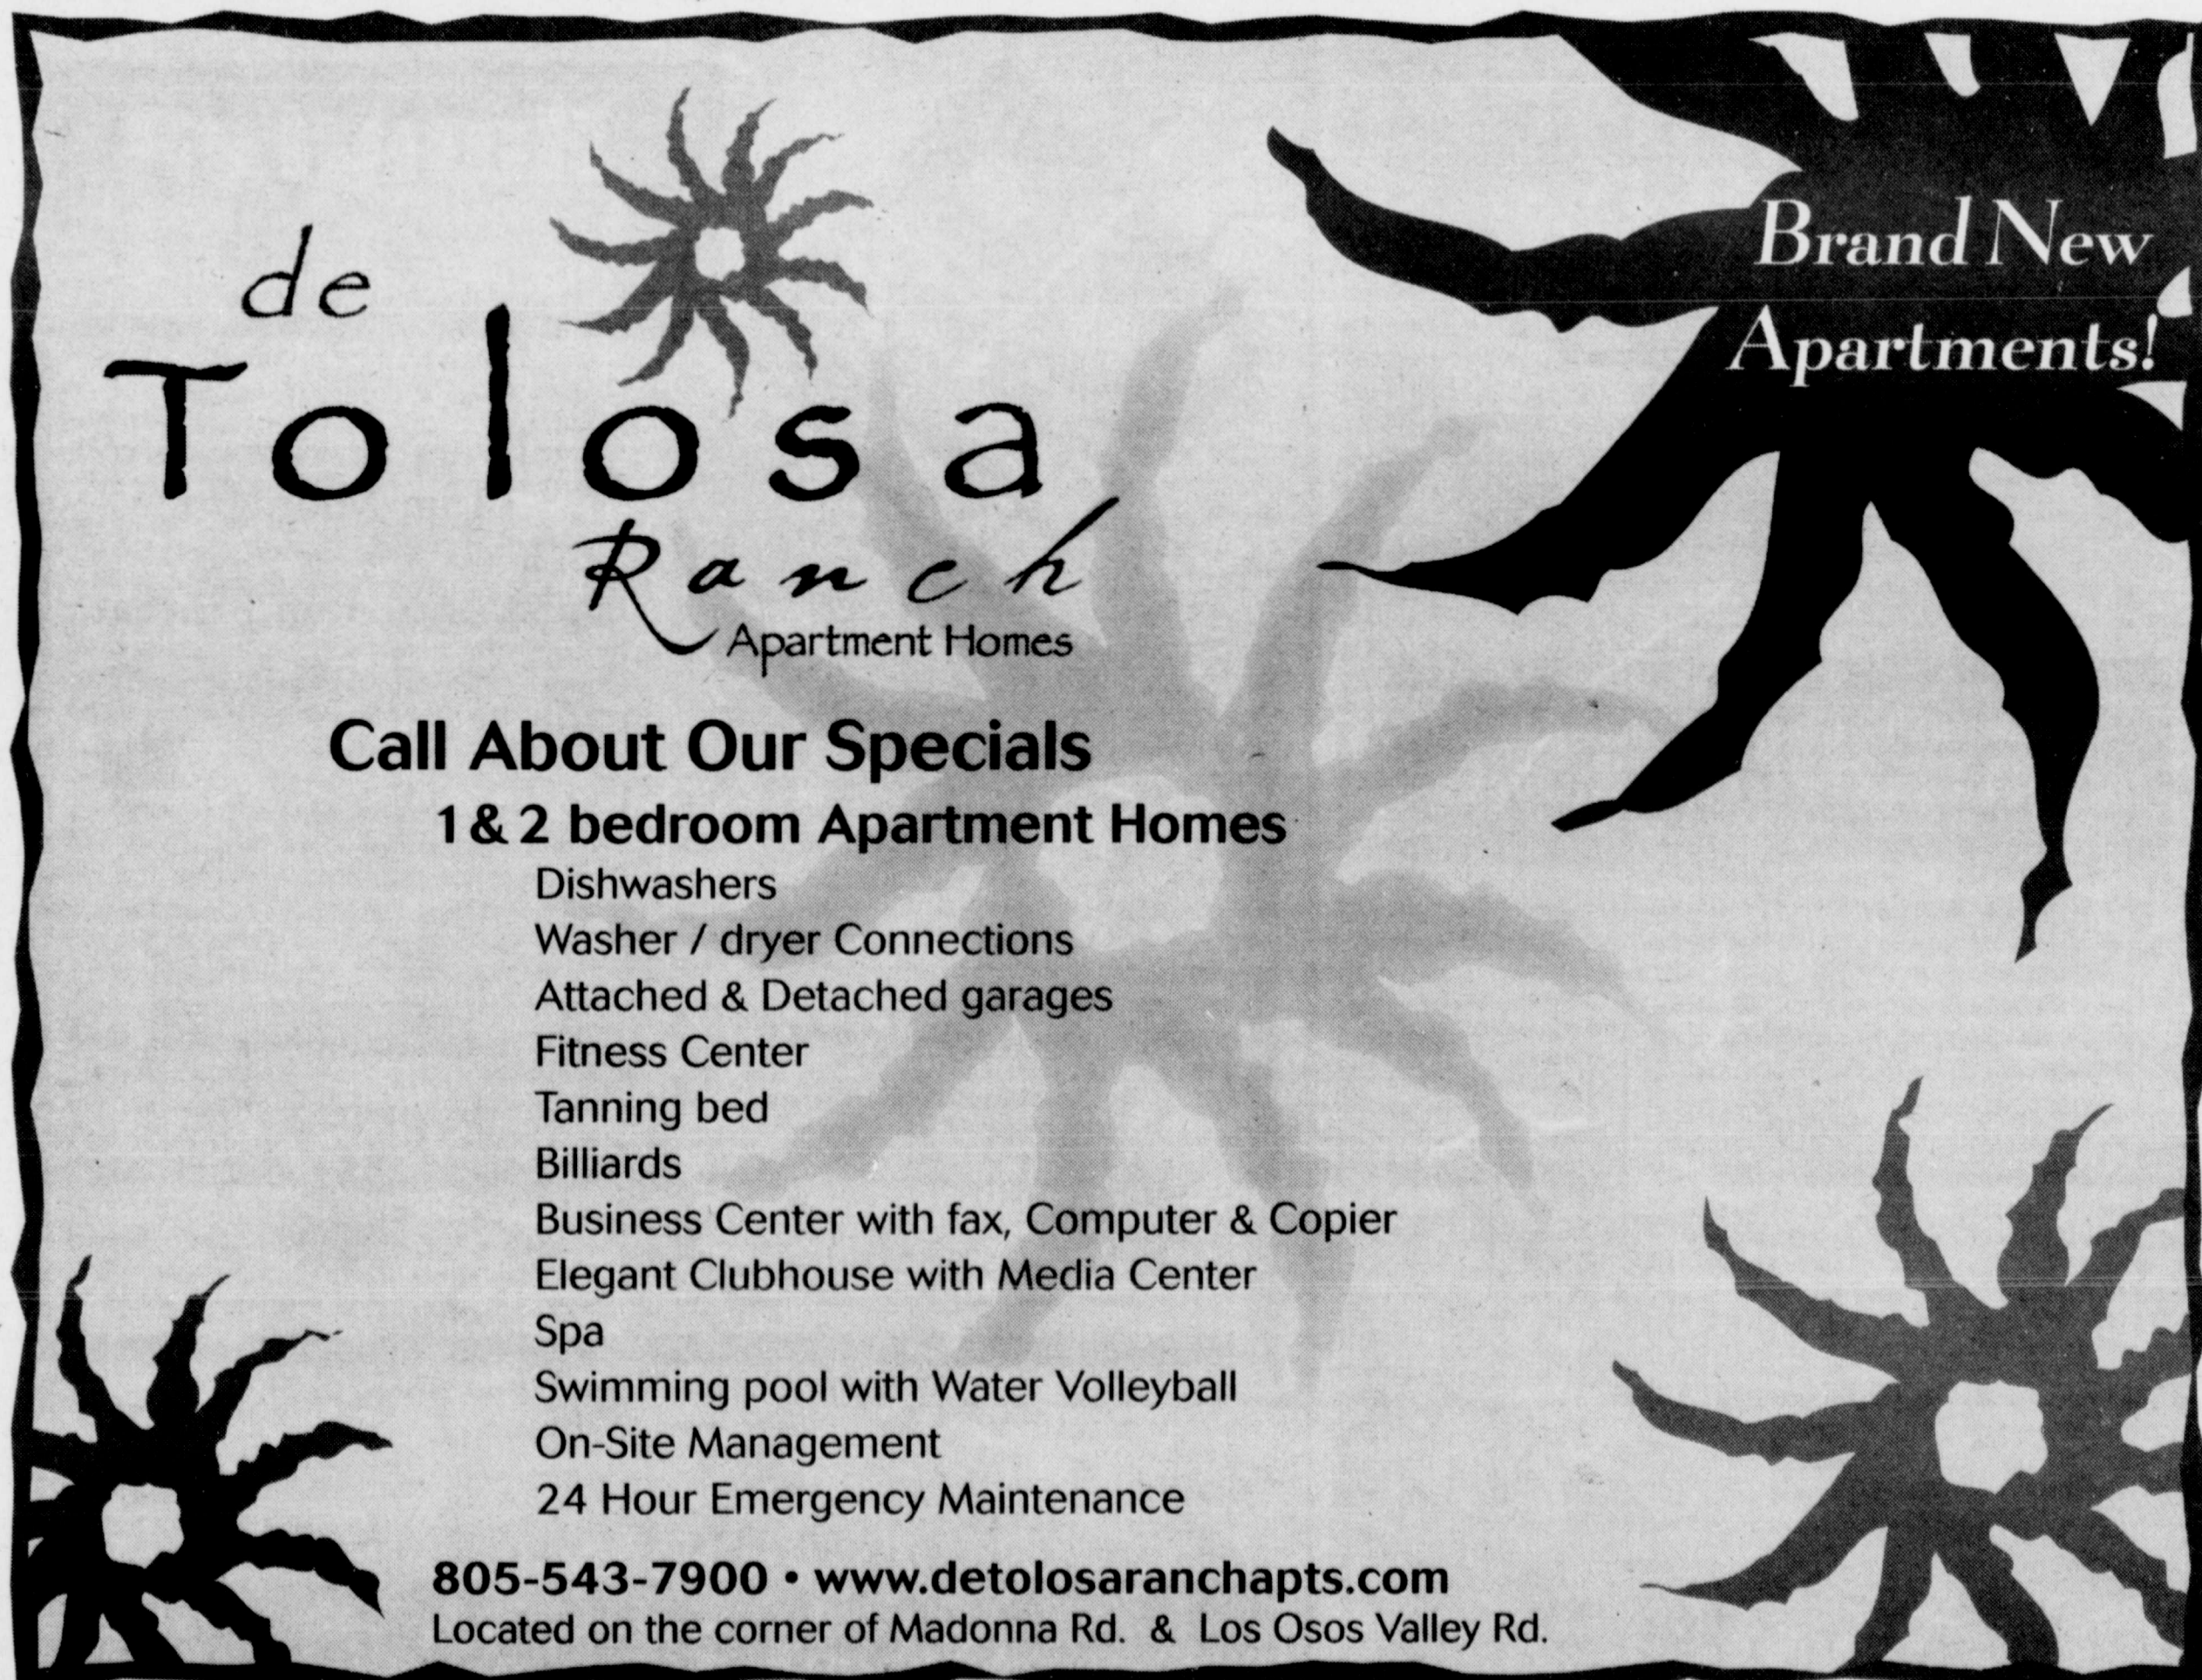

Under pressure from both at home and abroad, however, there are signs that Kuwait may eventually allow women to vote. They make up just over half the country's 850,000 people.

"It is as if Kuwait is their country, but not ours," said Dashti, 38, a U.S.-educated economist who runs a consultancy firm in Kuwait City. "We are in the same boat."

The country's emir, Sheik Jaber Al Ahmed Al Sabah, has tried to enfranchise women, liberal legislators have pushed to overturn the law, and women's activists have taken their challenge to court. All those efforts have failed, mainly because of Muslim fundamentalism and tribal traditions.

Kuwaiti law has barred women from elections for more than four decades. Men 21 years old and older may vote and run for office in legislative polls that happen every four years.

It doesn't always take two to flamenco

By Cathy Ayers

SUMMER MUSTANG STAFF WRITER

When somebody hears about flamenco dancing, images of loud music, strong, percussive foot movements and tambourines may come to mind. The energy and novelty associated with these images is what brought me to the Shell Beach Veterans Hall.

I arrived at the Veterans Hall on what may have been the hottest day of the summer, to learn that the facility did not have air conditioning. Although I spent the first few minutes trying to formulate a plan to slip out the back door and run for my climate-controlled car, I decided that I could probably tough it out for an hour.

While waiting for the other participants to arrive, I paid the $12 fee required to participate, and chatted with the instructor, Karina del Mar. She warned me that the class had been in progress for a few months, and that I may not pick up on everything they were doing but to give it a try. She also handed me a list of items that I should purchase if I chose to continue taking the class. Items on the list included flamenco skirts, high heeled flamenco shoes, jewelry and hairpieces imported from Spain. Wow, some people must go all out for this class, I thought to myself as I looked down at the clothes that I arrived in—the same ones that I had worn earlier to the gym.

As the other participants began to arrive, I realized that it wasn't just some of the participants that went all out on their apparel, it was all of them. A sea of brightly colored Spanish style skirts came waltzing in the door, all accompanied by pairs of high-heeled flamenco shoes. Apparently, my black Capri pants and white tank top weren't working as the camouflage I had hoped for.

Before class started, the participants greeted one another as they stared curiously in my direction. I came over and introduced myself; they all seemed nice.

Although I was off to a shaky start, my experience did start to improve. We began with some basic warm-ups and stretching, that were followed by a review of what the participants had learned in previous classes. I picked up on the steps and combinations easily because it resembles tap dancing, but with different rhythms and counts.

Throughout the class, the instructor explained the names of the different steps, and demonstrated modifications to make the steps more challenging, or less difficult. She thoroughly broke down all of the steps with counts, and then added music to the routine. I was surprised at the placid nature of the music, as I had imagined myself dancing around to upbeat, Latin-style music.

Although most of the participants had been attending for a few months, del Mar had to accommodate many different levels as some people had previous dance experience and others did not. Everyone seemed to enjoy the class and nobody appeared bored or frustrated with its pace.

Del Mar is offering a flamenco class in San Luis Obispo at American Dance beginning in July. This class costs $11 per session and will begin with the basics. Although it may be a bit slow-paced for people with extensive dance experience, it moves along at a decent speed for the novice dancer. For students looking for the traditional dance experience, this may not be the right class. But those who do come to try out the class, I recommend that women bring a pair of shoes with a solid heel, a long skirt, which can probably be purchased at a thrift store much cheaper than an authentic one. They don't need to be stylish...believe me.

Final time around for popular local store

By Samantha Weeks

SUMMER MUSTANG STAFF WRITER

Clothes of different attitudes and genres line the walls of the store. The smell of time hangs in the air and people of all types search for items that suit them just right. From ball gown dresses to female gladiators, Second Time Around has been able to accommodate the wildest of fantasies.

But after 25 years of existence, the 5,000 sq. ft. store on Marsh Street is saying goodbye to its customers. Bernice Souza and her daughter Charlotte, the owners of Second Time Around, decided it is a good time to retire.

"It's time to stop and relax from the tiring work," Bernice said.

She also said finding bizarre and unusual merchandise for the store is getting harder. She attributes the difficulty to the computer age.

"It is sad to see the store go, but it is a good time for the store to close because rent prices are getting so high and the store has been around for quite some time," Susie Marks said, Second Time Around employee.

The store is having an ongoing sale to sell off some of its clothes. All clothes and costumes will be half off until the end of July. Whatever is left will be part of a huge parking lot sale.

Some of the clothes are being sold to local vintage stores or to locations in places like Ventura and Los Angeles. Most of the costumes have been purchased by the local Goodwill industry.

"We will also rent out the costumes at our warehouse and hopefully make some money for our programs," Goodwill's San Luis Obispo County operations manager Pete Dunan said. "It ends up being a win-win for the customers, Second Time Around and Goodwill."

Soon it will rent out the costumes from the outlet store located at 880 Industrial Way in San Luis Obispo. The Goodwill outlet will have lower prices than Second Time Around because it is a large nonprofit thrift store.

Bernice said selling off the entire store and location was difficult because no one was willing to pay the costly rent. Yet, she is glad students will be able to get a hold of costumes for school events.

"I'm glad the clothes are going to Goodwill because it is a good situation for everyone," Bernice said. "They will rent out the costumes for reasonable prices and be able to satisfy the needs of the customers that come from places like Buellton or San Miguel."

Ever since she was a young girl,

Bernice has always been interested in clothes she said. She loved wearing something different everyday.

"I've always been such a clothes horse and it's been fun doing it as a career," Bernice said. "But I wouldn't have been able to do it without my daughter, Charlotte."

The creativity of the Souza's collections will live on in San Luis Obispo, but the uniqueness of the store will be missed by customers.

"I search for all my Halloween costumes at Second Time Around and I loved getting something that you couldn't find anywhere else," recreation administration junior Cody Dwight said.

Music fills the heart of downtown San Luis Obispo

By Susan Malanche

SUMMER MUSTANG STAFF WRITER

This summer the Mission Plaza will have everything from traditional rock to the diverse sounds of funk and salsa as the Central Coast's local bands entertain the community every week.

Concerts in the Plaza continues to attract tourists and residents to the Mission Plaza every Friday at 5:30 p.m. The San Luis Obispo Downtown Association has planned this free summer concert series for the past seven years. In its first year, 100 people attended the three concert series. Now the series has grown to 11 concerts with an audience of 2,000 people per concert, promotions coordinator Maryann O'Brien said.

"It's a great social gathering for people to meet after work or classes," O'Brien said. "We're offering an opportunity to hear the cream of the crop of local bands."

Concerts in the Plaza will continue in its third week this Friday with rock band Joose and present bands until it's finale on Aug. 29 with Big Daddy's Blues Band. The series will showcase a diverse mix of music that will appeal to a variety of age groups, O'Brien said.

"Everyone will be out there from students to children and parents to professionals," O'Brien said.

After Joose takes the stage, the line up will continue with local bands Salsón, JND and Goza. The six-piece ensemble of JND combines elements of rock, pop, soul and jazz.

"They're a real young band," O'Brien said. "They give a fusion of pop, jazz and funk that everyone will love."

Grüvething will make its first appearance in the concert this year, but groups such as reggae band Resination and rock 'n' roll band Cadillac Angels are two of the many bands to return to the annual event.

Although all of the groups are required to be local in order to perform in the series, bands such as Cadillac Angels have traveled worldwide. The band has performed in 38 states, Great Britain and was recently invited to perform in Germany and Belgium. Cadillac Angels' music is mostly original material with an influence of rock 'n' roll, surf and rockabilly, band-leader and lead singer Tony Balbinot said.

"We're always trying to set an upbeat atmosphere," Balbinot said. "People come to hear live music to escape, and I hope our music is fun enough to take them away from their troubles."

After Cadillac Angels' performance, the series will continue with the upbeat swing-jazz music of The Viper Six and the rhythm and blues of Big Daddy's Blues Band.

The Downtown Association began planning Concerts in the Plaza last January with an open call to bands. The coordinators weren't looking for a particular theme. The only requirements were that the band be local and provide danceable music, O'Brien said.

"You name it and it's out there," O'Brien said. "And we only anticipate it to get bigger and better every year."

Drug Bust: Are drug manufacturers helping or making profit?

"A woman admits that she thinks about her body image, enjoys sex (the sin of all sins) and takes anti-depressants to put the chemical that her brain was born without back into her body, and she is criticized for this? Hmmmm..." said Cara Khan of the Real World Chicago.

Khan, who gained notoriety on the 11th season of MTV's hit show, has been an outspoken activist demystifying depression for GOAL!, Go Out And Live! In the fall of 2002, Khan participated in a seminar titled "Depression in College: Real World. Real Life. Real Issues," which toured nationally to 10 college cities. The seminars were designed to reduce students' apprehension and reluctance to discuss depression and seek help. Khan, who was raised in Massachusetts and attended Washington University in St. Louis, has spoken at schools including Washington University, Tulane University and the University of South Florida.

Diagnosed with depression at an early age, Khan struggled for years to balance her life as a young adult with this condition. On-camera conversations with her roommates about her depression illustrated several misconceptions that Khan felt compelled to rebut.

Taking advantage of her newfound fame, she aligned herself with GOAL! which coincidentally is sponsored by Wyeth, a research-based pharmaceutical company. Wyeth sells the antidepressant Effexor(r) XR.

But, should drug companies be collaborating with depression support organizations? Certainly, their exposure to drug-seeking depressed individuals would be largely biased. Similarly, if the makers of Nicorette sponsored a group committed to quit smoking, they would clearly have a vested interest in the group members. Furthermore, if an allergist holds stock in Allegra won't he be more likely to prescribe that drug to his patient? The obvious dilemma is a severe conflict of interest.

About 1.5 million college students have experienced depression on America's college campuses. Consequently, suicide, often a result of the most severe cases of depression, has climbed to become the third leading cause of death among college students. Indeed, the need for intervention is apparent.

Yet, college students cannot be accurately informed of a drug if the National Mental Health Associations partners with Wyeth to promote a new drug. In fact, on GOAL!'s homepage, when you click on a link to inquire about treatment you are directed to Wyeth's homepage.

This shameless plugging cannot benefit patients. If the mentally ill are only given the option of one heavily endorsed product, they simply cannot make a reasonable assessment of the drugs available for treatment.

I guess the blissfully ignorant public will just have to wait for the Real World's studly Kyle to lead campus speeches on Viagra.

HIV law invades sufferers' privacy

You know how to contract AIDS and how to prevent it, but do you know you could go to jail for it?

According to the California governmental Web site, Health and Safety Code Section 120291 states that any person who exposes another to HIV by engaging in unprotected sexual activity is guilty of a felony, when the infected person: 1) knows he/she is infected; 2) has not disclosed his/her HIV-positive status; and 3) acts with the intent to infect the other person with HIV. The felony charge is punishable in the state prison for three, five or eight years.

California isn't the only one that has these ridiculous laws against privacy. In South Dakota, Nikko Britermos was arrested in his dormroom at Huron University for exposing AIDS to his girlfriend, according to an article VIBE magazine. Britermos had the same hopes and dreams as any other college student. He had a full scholarship playing basketball and had it all taken away because of some "routine check." According to the article, the health department came to checkup on Britermos's health and found a half naked woman in his dorm room.

Mike Moore one of the state's attorneys said in the article, "The health department wasn't there to investigate him to see if he was having sex with people. They were there to help him. And had it not been blatantly in front of them, we would not be here today."

So, I beg the question, how is the government supposed to keep track of AIDS patients and their sex partners? Maybe, they are going to make them register with the county they live in like sex offenders. The Fifth Amendment was written to protect privacy, but disclosing personal information like that to governmental officials to place them in jail is not protecting privacy. What does this teach those who might be infected? Do they rush out to get tested to seek medical help, or do they keep a secret because they don't want to be scrutinized by government officials? Four out of 10 HIV-positive men and women don't notify their partners of their disease because they fear rejection, and even violence, according to a recent study of 203 HIV patients conducted by the Brown University School of Medicine.

AIDS is being treated like the new leprosy. Making those feel isolated and unwelcome from the places that they grew up is no way to treat someone with a terrible disease. It's bad enough AIDS victims have to know that there is no cure and that things will probably be getting worse. Now they have to risk not being able to experience love because they have to disclose their information right away.

Yes, they should tell their partners that they have the disease and they should be practicing safe sex. But the government should not be dictating what they should be doing in their personal life. It should be up to them. Also, their partners should be practicing safe sex. The government doesn't see it that way and doesn't punish them for not having safe sex. It takes two to not use a condom.

It's a decision both partners have to make. So, then why are AIDS victims singled out?

CNN gives women a complex

In these times of war and unrest, many people are watching more news than ever. Because of this, women across the country have developed the "CNN complex." This is a serious condition in which women have become glued to their televisions, unable to pull themselves away from the news.

But why? Do they have an insatiable hunger for information about the world around them?

Maybe some, but I suspect that many more women are drawn to the news for the handsome men that have been showing up more and more often. No, not the newscasters, although Dan Rather sure is sexy. The heroes!

CNN has been filled with images of strapping young men in uniform since Sept. 11. It began with the firemen and policemen risking their lives digging through rubble to find any survivors. Next came the soldiers after we went to war with Iraq. Whether you agree with the war or not, one good thing came out of it ... lots of Marine footage!

Men in uniform fulfill fantasies for women on many levels. It's no coincidence that male strippers dress up as policemen or that so many movies are made about men in uniform; a nice looking man in a crisp uniform is a major turn-on for women.

It's not only the uniform that women are attracted to, but everything that the uniform represents. Let it be clear — I'm not talking about just any uniform. Men in McDonald's uniforms don't quite do it for us ladies. But policemen, firemen, military men and other law enforcement have so many other things going for them that when you add in the uniform, they become simply irresistible.

First off, these men are heroes. They are selfless and they risk their lives for the greater good. Next, their job involves some manual labor, which makes these men pretty buff (try to forget for a moment the balding, middle-aged, donut-chasing cop who gave you a speeding ticket last week and instead picture the yummy young cops from Third Watch). And what woman doesn't dream of the perfectly chiseled fireman rescuing her from a burning building?

Another important draw is the power. Men in law enforcement carry guns and are authority figures, as are military men, and women are always attracted to a man in power. We want a strong man who can save us from the big bad world. On the other hand, these men also are used to a chain of command and therefore know how to take orders as well. What could be better than a man that will be strong and powerful when needed but will take orders the rest of the time? Only a man with all those qualities in a uniform.

So men, even if you already have a career, you can learn a few thing about what women want through these heroes. And women, keep your TVs tuned to CNN, because there don't seem to be many of these heroes in real life.

Makeover show helps people with self esteem

Every time I turn on the television, there is a new reality series.

I will admit I do get sucked in. I have watched couples meet for the first time at their nationally aired wedding. I have witnessed strangers get thrown on an island, become friends and then vote each other off. I even watched a poor soul pick her mate without even seeing his face. However, there is one show that really hits home with me because along with being a reality show junky, I am a huge advocate for plastic surgery.

The godsend of a show is called "Extreme Makeover." It takes three people having troubles in the appearance and self-esteem categories and helps them.

The show covers everything. They consult a dietitian to help them eat better. They receive a personal trainer to tone their bodies. They get a new hairstyle, along with a make-up consultant for the women, and even a fashion expert to help them pick out flattering clothes. It is every fashionably troubled persons dream. However, there is a hitch. All of this pampering and working out takes place after a series of plastic surgeries to fix the problems that only the lovely hands of doctors can. These people go under the knife for sometimes 10 hours just to wake up in excruciating pain and once the pain stops, they look like someone else. One lady had a nose job, a boob job, liposuction, her chin trimmed down, lasic eye surgery and her teeth professionally whitened. This show isn't called extreme for nothing.

I think it's fabulous. These people are willing to go on national television and expose themselves in a tremendously vulnerable state so they can wake up one morning and feel marvelous. These people are not going through this to try and be like anyone else. Being like someone else would entail a personality make over. That would be a cool show. These people are learning how to eat better, getting a workout designed just for them and their troubled areas, and enduring one day of a little nip and tuck. They only want more self-esteem and a better feeling about themselves. Altering does not mean trying to be like someone else.

There is no exercise to workout the nose or the boobs. That is undeniable. If someone's small chest or large nose is bothering them, regardless of how much confidence he or she may have, people reach a point where they cannot take it anymore and seek the help of a doctor. Everyone on the show said the same thing. They were not doing this for anyone else but themselves and that is why I think this show is great. They are not trying to be supermodels or trying to land a significant other, they just want a little self-esteem boost.

These people aren't changing their lives; they are changing their bodies and how they treat their bodies. People say that the show is superficial and fake but what reality show isn't. At least in this show no one gets voted off by people they thought were their friends. They don't have to jump off skyscrapers or eat body parts from some awful animal, just to throw it up and be disqualified. This show is helping housewives, lawyers, salesmen and businesswomen change their self-esteem. Their personalities aren't being surgically removed or enhanced. They aren't trying to be someone else, just a better them.

lack of communication between the two parties. She echoes the notions of Yoder, as a firm believer in serving the best interests of the students.

"This place is about the students," she said. "When something hurts the students, it's really inexcusable."

The situation is intolerable, Labhard said, and it's only getting worse. The resignation of key industry leaders from the Advisory Board as well as experienced faculty is of paramount concern, as no replacements are scheduled to fill their shoes, she said.

The situation worries Danny Lanz, industrial technology senior and unofficial "ringleader" of the student movement. Lanz organized the marches that occurred on campus and downtown, which drew attention but failed to produce lasting results. He gathered 200 student signatures and presented them to President Warren Baker, from whom he said he received no response. Lanz is weary of how the administration is "turning a blind eye," ignoring the students' concerns and failing to properly vocalize their own.

As for the future, Lanz isn't particularly optimistic. The resignation or removal of lecturers and professors will result in a dwindling schedule this coming fall, he says, leaving students with no teachers and no answers. Lanz said no more than four faculty members are returning next fall, a truly "miserable situation" for both the faculty and students, he said.

Lanz is unsure about the formation of a council, which is slated to convene this fall in order to sort through the issues at hand. He worries that its members, chosen by Provost Paul Zingg, will cater to the best interests of the OCOB. The college's push to switch IT's focus from technology based to research based is another factor angering students, who anticipated an education from a polytechnic school, Lanz said.

Although he still has coursework to complete, he admits that he would rather graduate than continue in the faltering department. As he approaches graduation, the hands on education he expected at Cal Poly has all but "disappeared right in front of my eyes," he said.

OCOB Interim Dean Terri Swartz maintains that the college hasn't been notified of any withdrawal of funding. She said she is looking toward Zingg's "study committee," which will convene with the new school year.

"We're moving forward," she said. "I think IT is a valuable asset for the college of business. I'm looking forward to exciting times."

Three other Cal Poly athletes also placed at the meet. Senior Tyrone Ward took 11th in the men's long jump, senior Le Bren Martin took 22nd in the 400-meter hurdles and junior Maggie Vessey placed 21st in the 800-meter run.

Keith, the 2001 Country Music Awards male vocalist of the year is this year's CMSF headliner and will perform opening night on the Main Grandstand Arena as part of the Budweiser Concert Series. Along with Keith will be Steely Dan on July 24, Peter Frampton and Creedence Clearwater Revisited on July 25, and folk rock legend Bob Dylan on July 26, Kenny Chesney

July 29, and Alan Jackson and Joe Nichols on July 30 who will round out the bands performing on the Grandstand Arena.

New to the CMSF is the addition of the Golden Spur Syrah challenge. The wine challenge is the first competition open to commercial winemakers. Only grapes harvested within the counties of San Luis Obispo, Santa Barbara and Monterey are eligible and the syrah wine needs to be a current release intended for commercial sale. The Golden Spur Syrah challenge will be held Aug. 1 with the chief judge being Signe Zoller of Meridian Vineyard in Paso Robles.

For many Cal Poly students though the heavy bill of primarily country acts is big drawback for attending.

"I really don't think I'm going to go because it's all country artists and I'm not the biggest fan of country," said construction management sophomore Peter Tinetti. "There should be a larger variety of bands for people with different tastes, but I definitely wouldn't mind seeing Bob Dylan, that would be pretty sick."

OFFENDERS

Assemblywoman Nicole M. Parra, D-Hanford, would give campus police agencies the same authority as local police in releasing sex offender registration information.

There are three classifications of sex offense: high-risk, for those who engage in multiple violent offenses, serious, for one-time violent offenses or multiple misdemeanor offenses, and "other," which includes charges for pornography, indecent exposure, and spousal rape, said Fred Mills, communications and records coordinator for the University Police Department.

Megan's Law requires that information be released for serious and high-risk offenders only. It is unclear whether AB 1313 will have the same stipulation.

There are two or three registered offenders enrolled or working on the Cal Poly campus, none of whom are high-risk, Mills said.

The figure is low relative to other CSU campuses, as well as to a campus population of more than 20,000, he said.

"As far as violent crime goes, [Cal Poly] is probably the safest CSU campus," Mills said.

Campus crime statistics from 1999-01 reveal few forcible sexual offenses: two in 1999, three in 2000 and one in 2001. Statistics from 2002, which will be officially released in October, include one rape, Mills said.

In spite of consistent statistics, the real effect at Cal Poly is unknown, Mills said. Factors such as a mostly transient student population and the influx of contractors on campus due to the construction of new dorm buildings may change the figures.

Parra, who is head of the Assembly Select Committee on Megan's Law and Sex Offender Registration, wants to protect against such uncertainties.

"(Parra) wrote the bill so that hundreds of thousands of college students would have access to sex offender registration information for the individuals closest to them," said Nicole Winger, Parra's press secretary.

The bill was passed unanimously in the State Assembly June 5. It was reviewed by the Senate Public Safety Committee July 1 and is expected to be passed in the Senate, Winger said.

It is also likely that Gov. Gray Davis will sign the bill, Winger said, adding that the bill has had strong bipartisan support.

"Megan's Law doesn't know too many partisan boundaries," she said.

Megan's Law is named for Megan Kanka, a seven-year-old girl who was raped and murdered by a convicted sex offender who lived on her street. The original bill was signed into legislation by President Clinton in 1996.

"It's a great way to participate in sports without much of a time commitment and still get the experience of playing with a team," she said.

Long said the increase would not amount to much for individual team members, but may be a burden for those students who pay the entire cost themselves.

Sean Greenwood, a general Engineering senior, agrees.

"If people front the money, they might not get paid back," Greenwood said.

Rec sports officials have also eliminated the summer intramural program in response to the inflation, Long said.

The Rec Center has typically offered soccer, basketball and volleyball during the summer, but with approximately 20 teams competing, Rec Sports usually loses money on the season, Long said.

Poly track stars take on nation's best

► Frosh is alternate for U.S. team at Pan-Am Junior Championships

By Whitney Kellogg

SUMMER MUSTANG STAFF WRITER

Six Cal Poly athletes competed at the U.S.A. Outdoor Track and Field Championships June 19 to 22 at Stanford University, with freshman Kaylene Wagner and recent graduate Stephanie Brown turning in notable performances.

Brown captured an eighth-place finish in both shot put and discus and broke her personal record with a shot put throw of 55 feet 3 inches. With a throw of 189 feet 7 inches in the women's discus competition, Brown also broke the school record that she set last week at the NCAA championships by one inch. She placed eighth in that event as well.

"When you're a college athlete, it's very difficult to come back after the emotional NCAA Championships and still compete well," assistant coach Pete Corkery said. "She's earned a rest."

Brown had already qualified before the meet for the Olympic trials and Corkery said she could have an outside shot at making the Olympic team. She will train next year with Corkery and hopes to improve as she starts her professional career.

Though disappointed that her throws were not even better, Brown said she was happy to make it to the trials and that it was a good end to her season.

"I've accomplished a lot during my career at Poly," she said. "That's because a lot of people have helped me out."

Wagner, new to the team last year, tied for third in the junior women's high jump with 5 feet 9.25 inches. Her jump qualified her for a position as an alternate on the U.S. Pan-American Junior Championships team, but she was disappointed with her results. On the final day of competition, she competed against the top women jumpers in the nation and improved. She reached 6 feet 0.5 inches in the senior women's high jump.

"She didn't do what she wanted to Saturday, but Sunday was a good day for her," assistant coach Sheldon Blockburger said. "She would have flip-flopped those days if she could have."

Wagner said her first day of jumps was discouraging, but it was exciting to compete with some of the best jumpers in the final day.

"It was great to be with all those athletes that I idolize," she said.

Wagner will work next season with Sharon Day, an incoming freshman recruit.

"It's hard being a freshman — eating new food, living in the dorms, having a new coach," Blockburger said. "She did really well adapting like that. I think she'll have a good year next year."

Junior Ben Bruce also competed at the event and took 15th in the 3,000-meter steeple chase with a time of 8:41.71 seconds. After joining the Cal Poly team as a 20-year-old junior college transfer with no Division I experience, he is now at the top of Cal Poly's steeple chase list.

"He really stepped it up this year," assistant coach Mark Conover said.

Bruce said his transition from junior college to university athletics was smooth and, since distance runners usually reach their peak at 24 years old, he still has time to improve.

Love and basketball

Henry's first season in France a success

By Caroline Lindahl

SUMMER MUSTANG STAFF WRITER

"I kissed a whole lot of women over there," former Cal Poly basketball forward David Henry said of his nine-month basketball career in France.

Getting accustomed to the European tradition of kissing a woman's cheeks upon greeting was just one of the cultural differences Henry faced when he signed a contract with the Basketball Club of Dijon, France, last year.

After free agent workouts last May in Salt Lake City and Chicago, the 6-foot-8-inch, 200-pound journalism graduate from Santa Rosa signed a contract and reported to the team two months later for what he would call "the best experience of my life."

"I ate lots of bread and stinky cheese and drank wine," Henry said. Between practices and fine dining, he was able to travel to Paris. "I went to Paris four times," he said. "The Eiffel Tower was...wow! (It was) one of those things you never thought you would ever see and then when you see it, it's like looking at a famous person but being able to stare at them. It was great."

Henry, who returned to the United States last month, was offered the unique opportunity to play basketball abroad because of his impressive skills on the court at Cal Poly.

During his career here, Henry played in 105 games, starting 54, and averaged 6.4 points per contest, including a career-high 29 points in a game during his sophomore year against the University of Pacific. He averaged 9.2 points and 4.3 rebounds per game his senior year.

Consequently, Henry ranks eighth in Cal Poly history with 116 three-point field goals. He is also only Cal Poly's second player to continue a basketball career after graduation since Damien Levesque's two-year run in Australia.

"The reason he was chosen to play overseas professionally was simple," assistant coach Tim Murphy said. "He worked at getting a job. He is goal-driven and that's what makes him such a special person."

In accordance with his collegiate prowess, Henry won the 2003 All-French N2 Best Player from Eurobasket, a Web site comparable to ESPN.

"David is the ultimate over-achiever," Murphy said. "In every aspect of his life he gives it 100 percent on and off the court. He was not only well-liked by all of his teammates, but even more respected because of his work ethic, dedication and his unselfishness. We missed him dearly this last year because of his leadership qualities in all those areas."

While his teammates missed him, Henry was doing some missing as well.

"One of the hardest parts of being away was missing my family and my fiancée," Henry said. "Irene visited me for two weeks over Christmas. I proposed to her on Christmas Eve on the Eiffel Tower. It was a dream come true."

Henry's contract expired in May but he is eager to return to Europe to sign another. There is just one little thing he must do before he leaves ... he is getting married July 27.

Rec Sports may raise intramural fees

By Hillary Schuler-Jones

SUMMER MUSTANG STAFF WRITER

Fees will be raised next year for the approximately 250 intramural sports teams that compete each quarter.

Increases in Cal Poly Rec Center operating costs as well as inflation of student salaries are to blame for the increase, Rec Sports assistant director Joe Long said.

Rec Sports officials have not decided the amount of the increase, but Long estimates that it could be as much as $30 to $40 per team.

Students currently pay between $85 to $110 per team depending on the sport they play. The money generated is used to pay for intramural equipment and staffing, but it does not cover the entire cost of the program, Long said.

The remainder of the program costs are funded by the Rec Center. An increase would make the program self-sufficient and allow more room in the Rec Center budget for priority spending, Long said.

"Rec Sports officials feel that keeping the Rec center open for all students is the most important thing," Long said.

The student response has thus far been supportive.

"If (an increase) is what's required to play, it's worth it," said Ryan Kimes, statistics senior and intramural soccer and softball player.

Intramural basketball player Kara Leever, a business senior, said an increase would not keep her from playing.
